For example, let's say I have this class: `var Box = new Class({ initialize: function(param1, param2) { var self = this; // add methods here. }, move: function(x, y) { var self = this; // add more methods here. } });` Then how do I make sure that `move()` will be automatically called when I create an instance of `Box`? A: No, that is not possible. There are two reasons why this is not possible. JavaScript does not have a concept of "methods" in the same way that it has a concept of "functions". Every method in JavaScript is accessed by a different set of rules. Because the "this" operator is attached to a JavaScript function object, it cannot be attached to a (JavaScript) class. The this reference is always attached to the object that instantiates the function object. However, your proposed design has a number of problems. Some notes: The constructor function should not contain code that does not pertain to the object that is being constructed. The most obvious issue is this: this function calls `initialize`.

The function then attempts to call `move`. But the class has not yet been instantiated. So `move` is inaccessible until after the constructor function returns. I would strongly recommend that you create a constructor function that contains the logic that pertains to the object being instantiated, and move all of the "non-constructor" methods inside that. Rapid industrialization has led to increased air pollution and the contamination of our water, soil, and air. Indoor air quality can be related to the presence of bacteria, microorganisms, and other organic and inorganic particles.
