The original layout is restored to meet the standards of the International Printing Organization.Q: How to match a parameter value against a set of possible values in a single line? I am writing a bash script that checks for missing packages. The code looks like this: case "$1" in help) echo "Usage: $0 package" echo " Check for missing packages" echo "Usage: $0 [-h|--help] PACKAGE" echo " Check for missing packages" echo "Usage: $0 [-h|--help] [-k|--karma-path ] [-s|--sub ]" echo " Check for missing packages" exit 0 ;; * ) # TODO: Do something here ;; esac The question is about the "$1" variable. The script should exit if the argument is not a single "package name", otherwise it should do something. The $1 variable contains either one or many package names separated by spaces. How would it be possible to check if $1 contains a single package name? A: Use the [[ $(command) = *value* ]] == expression. $command can be shell command or a command which matches pattern. case "$1" in help) echo "Usage: $0 package" echo " Check for missing packages" echo "
