Field of the Invention The present invention generally relates to a device and method for providing temperature control of a human body, and more particularly, to a device and method for providing controlled hyperthermia of the human body which may be used for cancer therapy. 2. Description of the Related Art Hyperthermia of cancer cells (or tumor) is known to be an effective form of cancer therapy. Hyperthermia is the elevated temperature within a human body which is caused by energy absorption from an external source. Generally, a tumor has a temperature much higher than normal healthy tissue. Treatment of cancer by inducing hyperthermia generally requires that an external heat source be applied to the tumor site. In order to treat more than one tumor site, multiple heat sources must be used. In the past, the use of heat sources, such as microwaves, for the treatment of tumors has provided inconsistent treatment for the tumor. The result of this is that other treatment means must be used along with the treatment of heat to increase the efficacy of the treatment. This is particularly important in hyperthermia where an elevated temperature is required. The hyperthermia is generally applied by means of placing a heat source near or directly on the tumor. Heating the tumor results in killing the cancer cells by either thermally damaging them or causing them to die by other means. The effectiveness of the treatment is limited because the heat source has no mechanism for allowing the temperature to be controlled. The ability to control the temperature is necessary for the effectiveness of the treatment, particularly for an effective treatment of the region of the tumor. Several approaches have been used to control the temperature of an area of a human body b7e8fdf5c8
