. [Download WinZip for Mac 4.7.5 now.] [. 2, WinZip Driver Updater Key: Introduction: Autistic disorder is a neurodevelopmental disorder which is characterized by severe deficits in social cognition. Previous research using functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) in autistic disorder indicated a decreased amygdala response to emotional stimuli in comparison with healthy controls. The current study investigated brain responses to different types of social and non-social stimuli during fMRI in autistic disorder. Method: Sixteen autistic disorder patients and sixteen healthy controls underwent fMRI during social and non-social tasks. Stimuli were presented during the same task. Anatomical and functional images were acquired with a standard fMRI protocol (BOLD-fMRI) at 1.5 Tesla. A random effects model was used for statistical analyses. Results: The behavioural data were not different between the groups. Significant task effects were detected in both the social and the non-social task. The fMRI data of the autistic disorder patients showed the typical hypoactivation of the social brain network. However, in comparison to the healthy controls, a decreased hemodynamic response was found in the superior frontal cortex during a social versus non-social task. Furthermore, the main contrast of the non-social task showed a main effect of social versus non-social stimuli in the right precentral gyrus and the right inferior frontal gyrus in both groups. Discussion: Our results provide first evidence of different fMRI patterns in the social and the non-social social brain network in autistic disorder patients. Furthermore, the brain responses to different types of stimuli are reduced in the right precentral gyrus and the right inferior frontal gyrus in autistic disorder patients. Based on the frequent deficits in the social brain network found in autism, our findings might contribute to a better understanding of the pathophysiological mechanisms of this disorder. More particularly, the invention relates to such mechanisms for unlocking a remotely-actuated lock, having a key and a locking mechanism with a non-disposable key, by sensing the initial opening of the lock. Remotely actuated locks are known. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 4,701,460 discloses a simplified locking/unlocking mechanism, which can be connected to a terminal (such as a traditional lock and key) and is actuated by a remote control device. In particular, such a mechanism has a spindle mounted to the key and an idler connected thereto. The spindle has a first end connected to a mechanism that is movable between two positions, one being a locking position, in which it bears against the key to lock the lock, and the other being an unlocking position, in which it is spaced from the key. A bar is connected to the key by means of a link to connect the bar to the idler, and is adapted to move the spindle to the locking position when the key is inserted into the lock. A detent mechanism is connected to the spindle and biases it to the unlocking position, and a spring is connected between the idler and the detent mechanism to continuously bring the detent mechanism into coaction with the spindle and bias it back to the locking position. The bar is designed to be moved to the locking position when the spindle is moved to the locking position, so that the detent mechanism will be released and the spindle will move to the locking position. During actuation, the locking mechanism is first inserted into the lock, and the spindle is placed at the unlocking position. Then, a remote-control device is moved to the
