Video of that event shows that Clinton was grilled by several questions regarding her e-mails. One, in particular, is still kicking up dust over a year later, and it's mainly because of a piece of peripheral video footage that appears to have disappeared. Clinton's answer goes like this: "I did not send or receive any material marked classified at the time, but my lawyers now tell me there is a retroactive classification of some of them. So, you know, I'm not sure what the basis was for that at the time. That is a subject that they are reviewing now and I'm happy to work with them and with the State Department to make sure that is resolved," Clinton said. As many users on Twitter made sure to point out, viewers can see Clinton's hand as she reaches down to touch the podium. The implication — that Clinton's lawyers are currently attempting to obtain a ruling on the classification of her e-mails — has been a major talking point among those seeking to undermine Clinton's campaign. Now, the YouTube channel RussianBotHunter has released a video claiming to show a very similar moment, but the footage is almost certainly a duplicate from another similar event in North Carolina. To prove his point, RussianBotHunter offers a comparison with videos from the Nutter's Museum event, and the versions to which he refers have "top secret" in the title. First up is from the Fort Lauderdale rally. Here's the relevant bit of the segment in question: And here's a version of the same. With perhaps a little help from Google Translate. The second video, meanwhile, comes from a different event in North Carolina on February 18, 2016. Here's the relevant bit: And here's a version of the same. Again, the crucial difference can be
