Design With Nature.The present invention relates to a method for preheating a fluid or gas flow to be supplied to a furnace, wherein the fluid or gas flow is introduced into a heating block from a pressure chamber connected to the heating block via a channel. Air heating installations are commonly used for heating air for use in air conditioning of rooms, and in particular in central air conditioning and heating. The heating installations may comprise a heat exchanger made of a glass fibre-reinforced plastic tube and a water-cooled or air-cooled heat exchanger. The heat exchanger is placed in a channel of a heating block. When the heating block is heated, the heat exchanger transfers the heat from the heating block to the air to be heated. The heating block is usually placed in a furnace having a fuel supply. Therefore, the heating block must be provided with a supply channel for transferring the fuel supplied from the furnace to the channel. However, this supply channel may be a source of problems. One problem is that to maintain a seal between the channel and the supply channel, a high pressure is needed to seal the channels against leakage. This high pressure may cause the heat exchanger to fail. To maintain a sufficient seal, the heat exchanger must be carefully positioned in the heating block so that it is disposed at an angle. This angle may be disadvantageous since this may cause the flow channel to be obstructed by the channel. The temperature in the heating block is determined to a large extent by the supply rate of the heated fluid. This supply rate will be in proportion to the volume flow rate through the heating block. The volume flow rate is determined by the size of the channel, and therefore is a function of the channel size. It will be recognized that this channel size is subject to change. Due to changes in the design of the furnace, the heating block has to be moved, for instance, to a different location in the furnace. Also, due to external influences, the furnace may need to be removed from its fixed location. The size of the channel has to be adjusted to the requirements of the new location. It is to be noted that the supply channel is placed in the heating block. Therefore, if the heating block is removed, a part of the channel may be exposed to the furnace. This is harmful for the integrity of the heating block. The integrity of the heating block is
