The Ashen Arms are born with the power to crush all who oppose them, but they did not know what this power was for. Seeking guidance, they traveled to The Greater Lands, and found the Elden Rings, having finally come across something that could rightfully be theirs. They took a vow to protect the rings... and their power has since grown as they sought the strength needed to fulfill that vow.

Nether - The goal of exploring the lands and finding challenges, all while seeking more secrets of the Elden Rings.

Passage - The continent divided by crumbling artifacts and monsters, and the passage that crosses it. Only those entrusted with the keys to the truth can pass through the Passage.

Gale - They flew from The Greater Lands in search of a grace they had known as a child, whose feelings were later torn away when fighting the Ashen Arms on behalf of those they loved. Lady - A young, kind, gentle woman, who broke away from the Ashen Arms many years ago when they entered her world. She has since developed the power to control storms, and now serves the Ladies of Gale. Saga of Fire - A tale of Gods, the Rings, and the Majestic Ones. A tale of love, despair, and rebirth in a land where those three things come together. It took me awhile to finalize what my ideal class would be. In order to get started I set out to increase my stats to where I felt I could progress in the game. I leveled up with some less than perfect units and not all of them. I created a character that looked like I wanted him to. Well... except for his face. It wasn't so much his face, but I guess I just wanted someone to resemble me. I honestly don't remember, I just wanted to play a new fantasy, and I'm not a big fan of modern fantasy. Another thing I wanted to do was make a new character, so I started out with the character creation. I tried it out and decided it was a good idea to use my main character as my template. So I started off with that. I made him full armor, shield and a weapon of choice. Overall, the Creation is pretty simple. I searched for some stat books, read a bunch of information on them, and just went with it. The main part is the customization though. While my understanding on armor was a little lacking, I was able to read information and make educated decisions. After I have completed building the new unit, I will have a complete full unit of the class I have chosen to play with. I started off leveling up the weakest units and have progressed to stronger units. I have unlocked some level 6 units, which I'm glad they did. They are bad asses, so I really appreciate it when they are unlocked. For units that drop they do drop pretty much everything. You will always have enough for all sorts of things. So far, it's an enjoyable experience. With all of the units that I have encountered, I am in awe at how powerful they are. One of them was an archer, but I started it off as a spearman. Even with a spear, it was a formidable opponent. So I'm going for my best character and I'll be creating the unit later. After class design I will be looking into starting up quests and finding dungeons.

What's new in Elden Ring:

#11 I have a hard time scratching the surface without getting overwhelmed, way too much to see! #12 This game finally got me off my ass and back into triple-A games. No more playing ten games at once, this game makes me feel accomplished as a player. The game is still good for a first-time RPG player, or even if you are an RPG veteran, you have never played a multi-part game like this. There's a lot of preparation and detail put into every ability, the grinding is very methodical, and there are a lot of excellent, well-intended, memorable moments peppered throughout. You get what you put into it, and you can't really argue with the ambitious vision the developers implemented. The world is incredible, the combat is tense, and gameplay that'll grab your attention for hours on end if you let it. With all that said, it is an extremely niche, hard game to access unless you are really willing to grind, however there is some incredible icing on top of that. New content will likely appear for years to come even after there is no more DLC, and it manages to intrigue even hardcore JRPG fans. This is a game that will stick with you. The knock though is the same stance as every other new game - that I should've played this at E3 or something, but I never got a chance. Who can I blame? This game's story doesn't really do it for me, but the ton of upgrades, weapons, leveling, and customization make it pretty fun. The coolest thing for me though is the world. It's extremely vast and filled with a ton of things to do/explore/kill. Super Amazing. #20 Too bad i can't buy games on steam... my PC is too bad for these no-more-no-more pc games! #23 Design problems? Replaced a main hero combo system that was better than any other. Mega Graphics? Carrying a Tool + USB Drive of own for upgrades. Action Arena System? My god... + Online 100 classes you need to invest your money to make a team... The X, Y, Z system is for example WAY better than all the other combo systems in the world! Thumbs down. #27 This game didn't have much of a story, the presentation was adorable though the music was a little ostentatious in the beginning.

The last time there were photos of the flat-tailed nightjars in the wild was in 2000. Researchers have set a target of two years to track the birds to figure out why populations across Colombia, Ecuador and Peru are collapsing. Other bird species have declined in the Amazon, likely due to changes in the environment and agricultural development, as well as human activities. And where rainforest cover has been lost, other species have taken the opportunity to fill the void and take advantage of food sources. But among the nightjars in particular, the problem is extreme, said Richard Vigne, director of the research project at Brazil's National Institute for Amazonian Research. "We have a very worrying situation in which we could lose the nightjar from the entire basin. We've got four very important populations for this species — Colombia, Ecuador and Peru, and one in Suriname," Vigne told NBC News. This site is protected by recaptcha "The other species that could disappear is the red-footed nightjar (Caprimulgus macrodactylus), which is in an even more endangered situation than the nightjar." The birds are also facing extinction because their rainforest habitat is shrinking, and their populations are declining, due to the destruction of their breeding grounds. "It is getting harder and harder to find suitable habitat for the nightjars and to find these suitable places to nest," Vigne said. Nightjar populations in Colombia and Ecuador are in steep decline, while the opposite is happening in Peru, he said. In Colombia, the research project has identified the Mocoa population, in northern Colombia, as a hotspot for biodiversity. "On the one hand, it has these organisms that are even harder to find than nightjars, like the giant armadillo, the killer bee and the giant otter, so they are great organisms to look for," Vigne said. "On the other hand, they are a threatened species," he added.

"It really is a unique situation." All of this comes as the world's ecosystems are under pressure from human activity. "We've got so much anthropogenic pressure now in the Amazon, from the agriculture, the wood, the plastics, the agricultural
