This article reports a qualitative study investigating the primary factors influencing parental maintaining behavior in the context of HIV infection among adolescents. Data were collected from a subset of parents from a larger sample of HIV+ adolescents and used to identify primary influences on parental role maintenance. Three categories of factors identified were: (a) perceptions of parent and child conflict (i.e., parenting styles); (b) illness representations (i.e., the influence of HIV-related illness information); and (c) environmental constraints (i.e., availability of medical services). Findings suggest that parent-child conflict is more prominent than illness representations as a factor influencing the maintenance of parental role and that the impact of parent-child conflict is exacerbated 6d1f23a050
